AN ACT
REGULATING CLASS SIZE IN ALL PUBLIC SCHOOLS
AND APPROPRIATING FUNDS THEREFOR

EXPLANATORY NOTE

One of the most deplorable consequences of the government policy of prioritizing debt payments is the reduction in public spending on education. Because of the so-called debt burden, which takes up around 30% of the national budget annually for the past two decades, our public schools have been receiving a declining share in government spending. This has led to a worsening shortage of teachers and classrooms.

In order to accommodate a growing school-age population, the Department of Education has coped with these shortages by allowing extremely large class sizes. In the urban centers, it is no longer uncommon to see teachers handling classes with 60 to 80 students. According to data from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) Institute for Statistics, classrooms in the Philippines are among the most crowded in Asia. The country’s public elementary schools’ average class size of 43.9 is far bigger than Malaysia’s 31.7, Thailand’s 22.9, Japan’s 23.6 and India’s 40. In public high schools, the country registered an average size of 56.1, higher than Malaysia’s 34, Thailand’s 41.5, Japan’s 33.9 and India’s 39.
The Senate Economic Planning Office, for its part, found that “Pupil-input ratios reflect the extent of shortages, especially when disaggregated on regional levels. While the national average is 38.9 for pupil-classroom ratio, it could go to as high as 77 students in one classroom in the National Capital Region.”\textsuperscript{1}

The proliferation of grossly oversized classes is one of the main causes of the marked decline in the quality of education provided by our public schools. No matter how competent a teacher may be, the teaching and learning experience is adversely affected when there are simply too many students in a class. On the other hand, smaller classes allow teachers to spend more time on actual instruction and less on classroom management, and enable greater individual interactions between student and teacher.

Therefore, the oversized classes found in public school classrooms today violate the Constitutionally-guaranteed right of Filipino schoolchildren to quality education.

Oversized classes also violate the right of teachers to just compensation and humane working conditions. In the current system, a teacher handling a class of 70 students is in fact taking on the workload of two teachers, but without receiving any additional compensation. This practice of assigning oversized classes to teachers without extra pay is one of the main mechanisms by which they are “overworked, yet underpaid.”

This bill seeks to address these concerns by mandating the regulation of class size in public schools and prescribing additional compensation for teachers handling large classes.

This bill was approved by the House of Representatives Committee on Education during the 16th Congress.
