College education is a heavy burden not only for the parents but for the entire family. Stories abound where parents had to sell their farm animals, if not their farm lands, or borrow money against their houses, or beg from relatives - just to send a child through college. In many instances, one or two of the child’s siblings have to stop in order for the family to survive while they continue to support the one chosen to attend the university.

To assist poor families, especially those with bright children, to have the opportunity to gain higher education, government has introduced various affirmative action programs such as scholarships, grants-in-aid, student loans, and part-time employment, among others. The Study-Now-Pay-Later college loan program was implemented in the mid-70s by President Marcos and had some level of successes. But the economic and debt crises that ensued limited the government’s fiscal space and the overall impact of the program, even as this was resurrected later in one form or another.

In 2015, R.A. 10687 or the Unified Student Financial Assistance System for Tertiary Education (UniFAST) Act was approved which brought together all Student Financial Assistance Programs (StuFAPS) under one roof. In A.Y. 2015-2016, funding for various reached PhP5.65 billion. But shared by a total of 289,045 students nationwide, the average assistance per person was only some P19,000 for the whole year – which can barely cover tuition expenses. In 2016, R.A. Republic Act 10931 or the Universal Access to Quality Tertiary Education Act was enacted providing for free tuition and exemption in all other fees to all students of state colleges and universities (SUCs).
What is sadly missing in all these is the fact that tuition and academic expenses are but a small portion of the overall cost of sending a child through college. In order to study well, the child must have all the support to enable him or her to focus – to be well fed and clothed, to live in an environment that is highly conducive to learning, and to be armed with the books, supplies and equipment that he/she will need for coursework. Unfortunately, from a CHED budget of over P60 billion in 2018, only P1 Billion has been made available for student loans. If student living expenses were at only P5,000 per month, this could barely finance the needs of 16,000 college students or barely one half of one percent (0.05%) out of the country’s 2.982 million college students.

Only one out of every five Filipinos is able to get to college. Still, only around half of them would reach third or fourth year, if not eventually graduate. According to a study by the Angelo King Institute, the participation rate in the Philippines in higher education over several decades has remained relatively stagnant at 23% compared with upwards of 30% in our neighboring countries like Vietnam, Indonesia and Malaysia, 53% in Thailand and 94% in Korea.1 Poverty issues and the lack of sources of financing have always been major reasons. The absence of institutional mechanisms to address the demand for college funding has been considered as a kind of market failure.

This College Living Expenses Financing (CLEF) Bill aims to address these needs and to complement and complete the earlier student assistance programs in terms of support to the Filipino family in achieving their aspirations and their dreams.

Approval of this Bill is earnestly requested.
