The 1987 Constitution recognizes the natural and primary right and duty of parents in the rearing of the youth for civic efficiency and the development of moral character, as stated in Section 12, Article II thereof.

In the case of SPARK v. Quezon City, the High Court explained that it is during childhood that minors are prepared for additional obligations to society. The duty to prepare the child for these obligations must be read to include the inculcation of moral standards, religious beliefs, and elements of good citizenship. This affirmative process of teaching, guiding, and inspiring by precept and example is essential to the growth of young people into mature, socially responsible citizens.

Indeed, parents are instrumental in the instillation of good manners and right conduct to their young children as it begins in the home. However, there will come a time when children would begin spending extended hours in school and away from home. The schools necessarily take over the role of parents and teach the children proper habits.

Character Education/Good Manners and Right Conduct (CE/GMRC) was added as a separate learning area in elementary school by the Department of Education (then known as the Department of Education, Culture and Sports) back in 1991 when it issued Department Order No. 90. The list of objectives in the learning area were honesty, politeness, helpfulness and cooperation, obedience, concern for others, and sportsmanship.

In 2002, the Department of Education restructured the Basic Education Curriculum and integrated Values Education in all subject areas. Although a reading of Department Order No. 41, series of 2003 shows that it was the intention to emphasize Values Education, it appears that the same took a backseat instead.

In a recent study conducted by the World Bank\textsuperscript{2}, it was found that the elementary education curriculum in the Philippines devotes little attention to socioemotional skills. International experience shows values education as one of the areas that have the greatest impact on socioemotional skills. Evidence from developed countries suggests that socioemotional skills are an important component of job performance in a modern economy.

As aptly stated by Education Secretary Leonor Briones, "the world is changing. The values of our society and of the grown-ups are also changing...As we prepare our learners to be grown-ups, they can contribute to shaping such values because eventually, they too will become leaders."

Hence, this proposed measure seeks to institutionalize Good Manners and Right Conduct in the basic education curriculum in order to develop the moral character and consequently the socioeconomic skills of the Filipino youth so that they may grow into socially responsible citizens of the country.

In view of the foregoing, the passage of this bill is earnestly sought.
