EXPLANATORY NOTE

The advances in technology has reshaped the landscape in information dissemination and news reporting. A remarkable shift from traditional news reporting in print and broadcast media to the internet, particularly in various social media platforms has emerged. In fact, it was recently reported that Facebook has trumped radio and newspaper as news source, with 21% of adult Filipinos or about 13.9 million individuals using Facebook daily for reading the news.¹

The technological advances spawned tremendous and ever growing beneficial innovations. Perhaps unwittingly, it has also provided the resource for scheming, unscrupulous users to defraud, cheat, deceive, mislead, discredit, or sow chaos with either deliberate or random targets. Rising in regrettable significance is the proliferation of false, manipulated, or distorted information more commonly described as "fake news" that their circulation has now become a daily occurrence.

It is said that fake news had always been around. The difference now lies in the speed with which it is being spread via the internet. The internet has, indeed, supplied a variety of information and communication facilities that eased and widened the reach for news or other information anyone needs. It has, at the same time, though, liberalized the dissemination by any computer literate of just about any information one wishes to circulate. This created the opportunity for seamlessly uploading false or manipulated information and passing them on as true, factual, and authentic.

The effect of spreading false information can be very destructive. It generates confusion, misleads decisions, breeds misunderstanding, and destroys relations. Even more disturbing is the impact of misinformation on the young whose impressionable tendencies weaken their ability to differentiate and identify authentic and accurate information from those that are fake. This perceived weakness could lead the young as unwitting instruments in the propagation of false information. It could also undermine their development as responsible and dependable citizens.

The Constitution recognizes the vital role of the youth in nation-building. This is the compelling reason which mandates the State to promote and protect their physical, moral, spiritual, intellectual, and social well-being.

Recognizing the destructive effect of fake news, western countries such as France and Germany have passed their respective laws defining and penalizing fake news with varying emphasis. In this region, Bangladesh, Cambodia, Malaysia, Myanmar, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam have also passed their respective legislations prohibiting and penalizing the dissemination of propaganda, misinformation, fake news, or false information.

The Philippines now occupies the top spot for world internet usage index with an average of 10 hours a day. With this, the spread of false information in the country especially through the internet has become alarmingly prevalent. This threatens not only authentic journalism but also the credibility of other information circulated through print, broadcast or the internet. It then becomes imperative to prevent if not totally abate the distribution of false or manipulated information and shield the innocent especially the young from the adverse impact thereof by prohibiting and penalizing the dissemination of the same. This is precisely what this bill seeks.

Support for this bill is therefore earnestly sought from my colleagues.
