Cockfighting is an ancient spectator sport. It was partly a religious and partly a political institution in ancient Athens and was continued for improving the seeds of valor in the minds of their youth. It then evolved into a common pastime, without any political or religious intention.

Cockfighting is very popular in the country. Some see it as a form of gambling while others see it a sport. For some, cockfighting is an institution and a national recreation.

It has been said that long before the establishment of Spanish Catholicism, the practice of pitting two trained cocks against each other had been thriving in local shores. When Ferdinand Magellan arrived in 1521, it was already a roaring spectacle. Pigafetta's account on the Spanish's fleet arrival at “Polaoan” (now known as Palawan) included this observation.

For Filipinos, sabong is more than just entertainment. The sport is considered as a very important part of the Filipino culture that dates back to 6000 years ago. Filipinos, are very fond of the game that the Philippines is now generally considered as the Mecca of the sport. In fact, the country had hosted the grandest of international cockfighting spectacles including the “Olympics of Cockfighting” as well as numerous international gamefowl expositions.

In recent years, cockfighting in the country has climbed to a whole new level. It has become a booming Billion-Dollar industry that has not only captured the heart of the entire nation, but also the world at large. With prestigious international derbies held regularly in the country, cockfighting aficionados from all over the world has constantly streamed into the country helping spur the continued growth of the industry to provide a steady source of revenues for the government and thousands of jobs to Filipinos.

It is estimated that the Philippine gamefowl industry’s worth now stands at around P60 billion and is exhibiting a constant upward trend. It covers production of gamefowl feed and veterinary products; manufacturing of related equipment and tools such as incubators, knives (tari), cords (tali), wing and leg bands, feeders and waterers; breeding; cockpit facilities and other related undertakings.
The industry provides job opportunities to individuals directly or indirectly engaged in the sport such as sentenciadors (individuals who officiate the fight), gaffers (mananari), kristo (bettaokers), informal cock doctors (manggagamot), farmhands and cockpit vendors in the hundreds of cockpits across the country. Indirectly, the industry also provides employment to thousands of workers in feed mills and manufacturers of veterinary products.

With constant growth over the years, the industry is seen to grow even more. As the number of foreign cockfighting aficionados participating in local derbies continue to rise, some of whom have partnered with local breeders to establish more breeding farms in the country, new players can be expected to engage in the manufacture of feed and veterinary products, with more job opportunities likewise to be expected.

The burgeoning industry, however, is governed by an antiquated law that no longer conforms to the demands of the times. At the present, the conduct of cockfighting is governed by Presidential Decree No. 449 which was issued in 1974.

After forty-five years, it is necessary that the law be updated to keep up with the developments in the field, meet new challenges and provide new opportunities. It is necessary to come up with a new law that will provide measures and standards that ensure fairness in the conduct of the sport and likewise ensure that the government gets its fair share to boost its charitable programs.

In view of the above premises, the prompt approval of this proposed measure is earnestly sought and recommended.
