HOUSE BILL NO. 3222

Introduced by Representative EDGAR R. ERICE

EXPLANATORY NOTE

In year 1765, the San Roque Parish was only a small chapel located in Sitio de Espinas (now Libis) in the district of Kalookan, Province of Tondo. It was built by Fray Manuel Vaquero, an assistant priest from the Parish of Tondo, with the help of the people living in the area. When the construction of the chapel was finished, Fray Vaquero donated the images of San Roque and Nuestra Señora de la Nieva from Talaver, España. Over the years, the number of worshippers in San Roque chapel had grown significantly which prompted the then Archbishop of Manila, Antonio de Zulaivar, to separate it from the auspices of Tondo Parish and named Fray Manuel San Miguel as its first Parochial Priest.

In 1819, the San Roque Parish was transferred to a new site called the Paltok or literally the uppermost part of Caloocan (the same site where the San Roque Parish now stands). Fray San Francisco Xavier, Fray San Miguel's successor, began building a new parish but it was only finished in 1847 under the leadership of Fray Cipriano Gerola.

Through the years, when the Filipino people could no longer endure the tyranny of the Spaniards who ruled the Philippines with an iron fist, the spirit of rebellion spread throughout the country and the San Roque Parish was a living witness to the bravery and heroism of the many Katipuneros in Balintawak who rose and cried for freedom.

In 1899, the San Roque Parish was used by General Antonio Luna as one of his staging camps in fighting the American soldiers during the Filipino-American war. The Parish was partially destroyed when the American soldiers overran the forces of Gen. Luna while the entire Parish's ground was utilized as a temporary hospital for the injured members of the invading force. Subsequently, when the American forces led by the General Arthur McArthur occupied Caloocan, the San Roque Parish was converted into a regiment camp with Colonel Frederick Funston of the 20th Kansas Regiment as its commander.

After the war, the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus led by Father Victor Raymundo started the reconstruction and renovation of the San Roque Parish which was continued by the succeeding priests until 1965. This piecemeal repair, however, proved to be insufficient to prevent the deterioration and inevitable collapse. of the Parish had it not been for the efforts of the constituents of the City of Caloocan and, the strong determination and conviction of the Parochial Priest – Monsignor Boanerges Lechuga to rebuild the same.

In view of the foregoing, it is only fitting that the San Roque Parish be acknowledged as a national landmark and shrine for history, freedom and independence. The passage of this bill, therefore, is earnestly sought.
