HOUSE BILL NO. 4578

Introduced by the Honorable Precious Hipolito Castelo

EXPLANATORY NOTE

In 2010, Republic Act No. 9994 or the “Expanded Senior Citizens Act” was enacted. This landmark legislation provided more benefits to senior citizens, which include, among others, the promotion of employing senior citizens in the private sector by awarding tax incentives to private entities who are willing to take them in as employees.

Further, Republic Act No. 10911 or the “Anti-Age Discrimination in Employment Act” which was enacted more recently in 2016, provided an overall and general framework to prevent and penalize “ageism” or age discrimination in employment, save for certain exceptions, such as when age is a bona fide occupational qualification in the normal operation of a particular business.

Nonetheless, while these laws exist, it cannot be denied that there is still a dearth in employment opportunities to senior citizens in the public and private sector.

Global life expectancy has been steadily increasing over the years. Whether this be the result of advances in medical technology and science, surely, the effect is — senior citizens get to experience more of their twilight years. Thus, the need to institutionalize an employment program for the elderly is imperative in order to allow them to still be productive members of society when they still can.

There are studies to prove that older workers fare better in some respects as compared to their younger counterparts, in terms of performance in the workplace. For instance, the American Association of Retired Persons found that older workers possess the following qualities and skills: 1) reliability and strong work ethic; 2) varied work experience; 3) lower absenteeism; 4) more job loyalty; 5) eagerness to learn new skills and a positive attitude; and 5) strong people and customer service skills.¹

Further, more and more countries have been embracing the elderly as valuable members of the labor sector through the creation of public policy that encourages them to stay employed if they still can, and want, to earn a living. Notable examples are the countries of Japan, Germany, United States and Singapore where the employment of the elderly has become the “new normal”.²

As such, it is the objective of this proposed measure to make it easier for willing and able senior citizens to seek employment or stay employed beyond their retirement age by requiring both public and private entities to institutionalize an employment program specifically for senior citizens.

In view of the foregoing, immediate consideration and passage of this bill is earnestly sought.
