Studies estimate that a quarter of all Filipino families live in poverty. For the poorest Filipinos, eating three times a day is already a struggle—making going to school a luxury when it is actually a right.

The Universal Access to Tertiary Education Act helped equalize access to tertiary education by institutionalizing free tuition in state-owned colleges and universities.

But tuition fees are not the only expenses that students and their parents must shoulder. They will also need to pay for food, medicine, and books—the costs of which the poorest Filipino families may struggle to meet. Hence, this measure, which seeks to help the poorest Filipinos go to school.

This proposed measure hopes to achieve its goal through two means:

FIRST. By providing underprivileged students a discount of 5% when they buy books, medicine, and food, which discounts may be claimed by establishments as tax deductions; and

SECOND. By providing means by which government agencies can implement the provisions of this proposed measure.

Thus, the needs of the poorest Filipino students compel this Congress to pass this social legislation in helping more Filipinos raise themselves from poverty through education.

“Education is the key to ending poverty” because it is through education that the poorest Filipinos could unlock for themselves a better future.

In view of the foregoing, the passage of this bill in the 18th Congress is earnestly sought.
