The recent LRT 2 debacle is only one among a series of rail incidents and mishaps of a rapidly deteriorating railway system. The 9-month suspension of LRT 2 operations from Santolan to Anonas Station had brought much chagrin to the daily Filipino commuter and has exacerbated the already dismal traffic conditions in Metro Manila. And, as if the damage done had not been severe enough, the LRTA revealed that they do not have a disaster recovery plan prepared to immediately address the problem, which most probably explains the ridiculous 9-month long suspension.

In matters of public transportation, this level of service response and delivery is unacceptable. A sliver of gap in railway management and safety practices could mean tragedy for too many people. Moreover, considering that rail transportation is one of the government’s main squeeze to address Metro Manila’s traffic woes, a largely disparate, incoherent, and uncoordinated railway system certainly would not be of any help. Following best practices from multiple countries, we find that a dedicated agency for railroad administration is as necessary as investing heavily on rail equipment and infrastructure.

As such, the establishment of the Philippine National Railroad Administration (PNRA) is proposed. The PNRA shall be the foremost authority in rail management in the country and shall be given the power to formulate and implement a National Rail Plan, including the evaluation and integration of existing rail policies, programs, and projects unto the said plan in order to achieve its goal of providing for the country a reliable, safe, and effective rail transport service. It is also tasked to execute regulatory and inspection functions in five areas of rail safety disciplines, namely: hazardous materials; motive power and equipment; operating practices; signal and train control; and track. This is to prevent any future train incidents from happening or, should the worst come, be able to mitigate the impact of any such incidents.

It is said that failure is the seed of growth. If so, we have had more than our fair share of failures in improving and maintaining the Philippine railway system and the only thing that is left is for us to learn and grow from our erring ways. Let the PNRA be the budding attempt to pursue long-term growth.

In view of the foregoing, immediate passage of this bill is earnestly sought.
