EXPLANATORY NOTE

The important role of guidance counselors to the personal, social, and academic development of children, especially those enrolled in public elementary and high schools, is a fact beyond question. Guidance counseling helps students to build healthy interpersonal relationships, guides them in their career selection, and helps them to effectively manage and deal with emotional conflict and personal problems at their stage of development.

Republic Act No. 9258, otherwise known as the “Guidance and Counseling Act of 2004” recognizes the importance of advancing and protecting the guidance and counseling profession by establishing preventive regulatory mechanisms and standards of practice. However, its goal of institutionalizing measures to guarantee “world-class and internationally recognized” professional services comes at the expense of meeting the need for such services by the public.

The country suffers from a severe shortage of registered guidance counselors (RGCs). The Department of Education requires public and private elementary and high schools to hire one guidance counselor for every five hundred (500) students. But as of July 2017, the Philippines only has 3,220 registered guidance counselors since the first batch of licensure examinees in 2008. The low number of RGCs has been attributed to the rigid standards set forth under R.A. 9258, particularly for licensure examinees. While a bachelor’s degree is enough to take the Licensure Examinations for Teachers (LET), a master’s degree is mandatory to take the licensure examination for guidance counselors.
To address this problem, there is a need to relax the requirements for examination as provided under Section 13 of Republic Act No. 9258. Furthermore, it is indispensable for empirically-based guidelines to be set for the determination of optimal guidance counselor to student ratios in public schools which can be adequately provided by the government, taking into account the need for the services as well as the availability of financial and human resources of the State.

In view of the foregoing, immediate approval of this bill is earnestly sought.
