EXPLANATORY NOTE

In a world where everything is fast-paced, it can sometimes be hard to keep up. Pressure coming from the workplace, family, society, personal life, and even social media keep on piling up. Thus, it is not surprising that the mental health and wellness of working Filipinos is steadily declining.

According to the Department of Health (DOH), the number of individuals in the Philippines with major depressive disorder is already at 17 million.1 Meanwhile, the incidence of suicide increased both in males and females. The rise of mental health disorders is even exacerbated by either the lack of access to professional help or the stigma that still exists in society against those who seek help for their mental health issues.

Hence, in order to address the needs of the modern workforce for better mental health initiatives, this bill aims to provide employees in the private sector five days per year which they can use to go to a mental health professional for consultation, to receive therapy from a mental health practitioner, or even just to take a break from the stressors of daily life. This bill likewise mandates employers to offer and implement programs to ensure their employees' mental well-being. It is hoped that through this legislation we can contribute in raising better mental health awareness and in creating more accepting work spaces where every person can thrive mentally and emotionally.
