EIGHTEENTH CONGRESS
Second Regular Session
House Bill No. 7940

INTRODUCED BY
REP. ALFRED VARGAS

AN ACT
ENHANCING CITIZENS’ ACCESS TO INFORMATION DURING DISASTERS
BY MANDATING GOVERNMENT ISSUANCES TO BE WRITTEN IN PLAIN LANGUAGE AND TRANSLATED TO THE LOCAL LANGUAGE OR DIALECTS IF NECESSARY, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

EXPLANATORY NOTE

On November 8, 2013, Super Typhoon Yolanda (international name “Haiyan”) made landfall in the Philippines and laid waste to the Visayas group of islands, home to 17 million people. The typhoon’s rage affected more than 14 million people across 44 provinces, displacing 4.1 million people, killing more than 6,000 people and leaving around 1,800 missing. It is one of the most damaging natural disasters in the history of the country with 1.1 million houses destroyed and 5.9 million workers disrupted of their livelihood.1 Families were torn apart and the Filipino people mourned such great losses.

Technically speaking, Yolanda brought not only strong winds and heavy rain, but also a wall of seawater that crashed inland, leaving barely any structure standing in its path. Meteorologists refer to this phenomenon as a “storm surge” and has warned the public the moment it appeared on their radar. However, a large portion of the affected population did not expect tsunami-like waves crashing on their homes during the height of the storms. Everyone was caught off guard despite early warnings from the Philippine Atmospheric, Geophysical and Astronomical Services Administration (PAGASA). Experts have assessed that this unfortunate event was a possible result of the lack of understanding of the public on certain technical terms on natural disasters.²

While the world continues to experience unexpected environmental changes, disaster risk reduction and preparedness should be made an utmost priority. The Philippines, as a country located in the Pacific Ring of Fire, has made significant efforts in disaster mitigation and resilience. However, the experience with Super Typhoon Yolanda has taught us that the general public must be included in our nation's plan and be properly informed on matters relating to disaster risk reduction and preparedness.

This bill seeks to require all government agencies and local government units to translate to Filipino and any other appropriate regional language or dialect all announcements, advisories, press releases, issuances, and any other information relevant to a local or national disaster or emergency. At the heart of this legislation is the vision of good governance to make information available and accessible, particularly, to make such public notices easily understandable by the general public. The jargons used on scientific and technical terms on natural occurrences must be broken down to a more understandable medium and must be disseminated as extensively as possible through all available means in order for the government to better save lives.

In view of the foregoing, the approval of this bill is earnestly sought.
